When one announces that the most magnificent thing about life is life, one is not toying with the words, says C. Hanford Henderson, in Atlantic. One is simply announcing a very obvious and far-reaching truth. But it is a platitude which will bear repeating; for rich and poor alike, the world over, are squandering nothing quite so remorselessly as just this most magnificent of all their possessions, their life. The poor are squandering it on food and shelter and elothing, and very wretched stuff at man, died from the effects of a dose of that; sometimes they are squandering1158 am rough on rats taken with suicidal in- it in forced or self-chosen idleness. So the same life may be squandered on that which is not worth while. or expended on that which is excellent;

> The altogether significant, compelling, momentous thing is the idea. The housewives in a certain section of Omaha would very much like to interview the kindly-faced and eloquent gentleman who recently sold them Bermuda lily bulbs. They have a few things to say to him and are prepared to say them in proper style. The kindly faced and eloquent gentleman in question recently passed through the city and gathered up a goodly quantity of shekels, the same being current coin of the realm. In return therefor he left bulbs that were warranted to produce lilies that would cheer the hearts been incorporated in New Jersey to of the housewives and make home a tomers now have choice lots of wellpose of at ruinous prices.
